Background: Mazohra Thami is a current student of architecture at the University of Washington. She values Seattle's strength in its closeness to nature, recognizing the importance of parks and open spaces as breathing room to buildings and citizens and in providing casual encounters that enhance community building. Working with the Pomegranate Center and through her studies, she has seen how parks provide opportunities for gathering and recreation that contribute to influencing and uniting community. She was selected this year to represent the University of Washington's Architecture Department at a regional student Leadership Institute hosted by the American Institute of Architects' Regional Conference in Tucson. Since returning, she has joined with fellow students to prepare a seminar about collaboration in the design process. Her architectural perspective is a welcome asset to the Parks Board, and her broad insight and collaborative nature will be an excellent addition to both the Parks Board and Get Engaged program.
